The Epgrade "And if he left," . From Carroll's Through The Looking-Glass marks the guideline for the arrival of the "gray man" of a south imprecise where "lepers are rare". Such appearance catapults to the reader to a strange and exotic environment, where the baroque style and the scholar vocabulary immersed it in a world oblivious while suggesting a timeless, eastern environment. When this learning is complete and the time is born that the spiritual son is born, the creator-magician kisses him and orders the young man to come to a distant temple. By believing him the descent he is worried that the son of him discovers him the origins of him and feel humiliated when he realizes that he is simply dream of someone. However, unlike Borges, Calder N does not suggest any control over dreams. As a consequence of conflagration, it discovers that the fire did not affect its meat and draws the logical conclusion that it is also the product of the dream of someone. Some critical studies have suggested the parallelism between the magician and the process M I create a child with the study of the writer and process of creating a text. The result, in some cases, is a reflection of the author that at the same time has a similar parallel relationship with that of Him of Him (which, implies Borges, could in turn have the one of his own God, and so as to infinity ). In the end the young man awakened and from then on the magician passes two years instructive in the mysteries of the universe and in the worship of fire. The circle as a m ástical figure leads inside a symph of connotations and denotations. He decides to follow another method since the conformation of dreams is among the most difficult things that anyone can try.
